to put it bluntly, you can only think 2 if you ignore all the evidence. it's been conclusively proven that the point bug was never supposed to be there.

here's the thing that must be said:

at the beginning of the pointsfix debates, the entirety of the argument from the anti-pointsfix side was: "this was supposed to happen, it's not a bug". that was the only argument they felt was necessary; evidently they were convinced of it and they were also convinced that it was enough to close the debate.

it was soon proven wrong, and then the anti-pointsfix crowd basically split into two schools of thought.

1. people who refused to look at the evidence
2. people who did acknowledge that the pointsfix is the original renegade points system, but at that point decided that whether it was the original points system didn't matter at all anymore.

when they thought the opposite, they considered it the be-all end-all of the argument. when it was proven wrong, it suddenly became irrelevant. i'm sorry to say that people are not allowed to forget that they did this.
