I thought I had a bladder infection, It started like on Friday or Saturday, I was going to the bathroom alot more often then normal, about once an hour or so, and drinking the same amount as normal. It was really annoying. There was no pain, blood, or other symptoms as comes with a bladder infection except I was peeing alot more often. My mom brought me to my doctor because I wanted antibiotics to make it go away, it's kind of hard to sit through a 60 minute class and focus while constantly having to go to the bathroom (Yes it actually felt like I constantly had to go to the bathroom, even after I had just finished!) Well I went in myself the doctor asked me alot of questions . . . here they are.

Doctor: Is there any pain when you pee?
Me: No

Doctor: No burning, pain, or discomfort?
Me: No

Doctor: Are you sexually active?
Me: No

Doctor: Do you have a girlfriend?
Me: No

Doctor: Is there any blood when you go?
Me: No

Doctor: Are you sure your not sexually active?
Me: Yes, I'm sure

Doctor: When you relieve yourself does it still feel like your bladder is full?
Me: Yes

Well, they had me pee in one of those little cups to test it. You know how I said there was no blood when I peed? Well, there was that time, there wasn't before I went to the doctors office, and there wasn't after, only that one time. . . the doctor said he didn't think it would be bad. . . My mom was in the room when we got back, we started talking about what we wanted for dinner. 5 Minutes later the doctor came back in and sat down. He said that it is not a bladder infection. It is a urinary tract infection, which are rare in men, and higher in men that are not circumcised. Guess what, I wasn't circumcised. He said he's not a fan of it and it's rare anyways, so unless theres a good medical reason to get circumcised, what's the point. Well anyways a urinary tract infection can cause kidney problems, and they may re-occur. I have to get two tests done, one they put dye in my bladder for something, and the other they do an ultrasound to check my kidneys and bladder. Basically, if the tests turn out bad I will have to get circumsized.

There is NO study whatsoever that was accepted by the medical community that shows a difference between circumcised and non-circumcised people.

Glyde, there is with the chance of someone getting a urinary tract infection. . . Someone not circumcised is a little more likely to get a urinary tract infection than someone who isn't. It's still rare in either case though. Read the below site. . . I'll find more about it later if you want.
<http://www.noharmm.org/AAP1989.htm>

It's gonna suck since I'll probably have to get circumcised. . . I'm almost 16. I have my two tests Friday the 10th of December (Not sure if I mentioned it in my above post or not)

It's gonna be odd if someone asks me why I was absent from school . . . Especially if I have to get circumcised and someone asks me. I can see how the conversation is gonna go.

One of my friends: So, Spree why were you absent? (Yes, my friends do call me by my online name)

Me: I had to get circumcised.

One of my friends: What?!

Me: I had to get circumcised.

One of my friends: WTF! you weren't circumcised. Your joking right?

Me: No

One of my friends: WTF!

Yes they do actually, most doctors just circumsize the baby immediately after it is born unless the parents say otherwise.

Polyuria (frequent urination) is a symptom of diabetes as well...Did your physician ask questions in that regard & do you have a family history?
If its merely a UTI, then you'll take some antibiotics & it'll be over real soon. Good luck

Yeah, it's a Urinary Tract Infection, My mom's side of the family has a history of Diabetes, and a history of being over weight. I Luckily am not overweight. I don't think he really asked any questions in that regard. I got the antibiotics and it seems to be helping, I don't constantly feel like I have to urinate, but it's still often, not as much as before though. I've been taking the antibiotics since Tuesday. Only thing about it being a Urinary Tract infecton is that I have to get two tests done and most likely get circumscized.

I will be under General Anesthesia If I have to get circumcized, not Local Anesthesia. So that's good, I'll be knocked out if I have to get circumcized, then I'll be getting pain killers, hopefully like the ones when I got my wisdom teeth out, they make you sleepy. And I'll be able to miss school for a couple days or something probably. It's very rare even for non circumcized guys to get a urinary tract infection so don't think that if your not cicumsized you will definately be getting a urinary tract infection.

Its not like that here in england, your only circumsized if either your parents request it at birth, a medical condition requires it, or you ask for it yourself later in life.

Im not planing on having this procedure done, I was born with the extra skin, so I wont be getting rid of it

Well, anyways, on my previous post I said I was going to the hospital Friday the 10th to get a couple of tests done. Well, anyways. I had my kidneys and bladder ultrasounded. And then for the other test they had me take all my clothes off and get into one of those things that you wear at the hospital. Then a male nurse came in and put some gell stuff on my penis so I wouldn't be able to feel the tube get shoved up the urethra into my bladder. It stung a little for about 10 seconds then it was all numbish. He put the tube up there and then some other person hooked the container of dye up to the tube and they watched the dye getting put in and told me to tell them when I felt like I had to go pee. They put like 2 and 1/4 pints into my bladder then I had to go pee. So they had me pee into this jug like thing and as I was peeing they watched in on the X-ray thing and made sure that the dye went where it was supposed to, not back up into my kidneys or anything like that. They said it all looked good, so I am hopign this means I will not have to get circumcised, but you never know, I still may have too. That's about it for today. I missed a full day of school for 2 tests that took 1 hour, though it took about 45 minutes to drive there, so that was about 2 and a half hours. My mom and I went to the super market afterwards and I had to get all the stuff on the top shelves since I'm taller than my mom, and all the stuff on the lower shelves because of her knees. Ok, that's finally all of what happened today.

That's retarded... really. The only "problem" with the extra skin is that you might not clean it but what guy over 12 (or so) doesn't give themselves a really good cleaning in the shower cough.
And if you don't, maybe you should.

If you don't want too much info, don't read any further. You were warned.

First off, why should you subject yourself to having yourself mutilated when careful washing can prevent the problem? Circumcision is a choice you can't take back. I would recommend that you ask to hold off. Tell the doctor that you will make extra effort to wash yourself better.

Next, there are huge differences in function. Uncircumcized penises generally will experience much more intense sensations during bedtime activities because the head isn't rubbing against your clothes all day (if you want to prove this, shave a big section of your leghair off (in a place no one will see) and put on pants... the places where your hair covered your leg are now super-sensitive because they're not used to being touched.

OK, next... this is the real "TMI" part... during intercourse, the part that feels good for the guy is the whole 'moving in and out' bit... for girls, it's generally the part about having something located in that orifice and repetitive pressure on either the clitoris or g-spot (outside and inside respectively). For some girls, the friction of moving back and forth becomes uncomfortable after a period of time. Having the extra skin minimizes the friction on the girl while still letting you experience it.

Now that you know more than you wanted to know... I hope that you'll make the decision that's best for you and don't just blindly trust anyone. There are plenty of websites on this subject as well.
