Bellevue, WA and Los Angeles, CA - April 29, 2005 -- Valve and Vivendi Universal Games (VU Games) today announced the settlement of a pending federal court lawsuit filed by Valve in August 2002. The parties have resolved their differences, and the settlement provides for the dismissal of all claims and counterclaims. Under the settlement agreement, VU Games will cease distribution of retail packaged versions of Valve's games, including Half-Life®, Half-Life 2, Counter-Strike™, Counter-Strike: Condition Zero and Counter-Strike: Source, effective August 31, 2005.

Additionally, VU Games has notified distributors and cyber cafés that were licensed by VU Games that only Valve is authorized to distribute Valve games to cyber cafés and grant cyber café licenses. Cyber café operators that were licensed by VU Games have also been notified that any license agreement from Sierra Entertainment, Vivendi Universal Games or any of their affiliates or distributors that may have granted rights to use Valve games in cyber cafés, whether written or oral, is terminated.

This basicly means that Valve dropped VU as a publisher, and is looking for another publisher, from what I've heard it will probably be Activision.

I wonder how many crazed HL fans will buy the newly published game when it comes out, just to have the box.

Hell, maybe the current box will be worth something someday because of this

They signed with Activision a while ago. Valve will continue to push Steam as their distribution platform, with Activision handling the retail side and consoles.

It makes sense that it would be Activision, but why did Valve want to sue VU?

Valve is only about 30 minutes away from where I live. Someday I'll visit there.
