Hate is a strong word, yet there are only few regions where the majority of the citizenship holds a favorable view on Germany. Ireland, Scotland, Croatia, a good share of muslim countries, perhaps Japan and a few others in that area come to mind, but that's about it. I'm not saying the poor Germans have to battle prejudice, however, I do sometimes strategically reveal myself as either German or American when meeting new people.

I really don't know why Poland gets so little respect. Perhaps because Warsaw isn't in the same league as Prague and Budapest. Perhaps because Polish women aren't considered as pretty as Czech women and better known as housekeepers. Perhaps there weren't enough significant Polish figures in history, inventors, entrepreneurs. Perhaps it's because not many have heard of Polish culture, food or significant exports. Perhaps its because they seem far more bitter and unable get over WW2 than the Jews, even though many Polish nationals happily participated in the Holocaust, which left 6 million Jews murdered, while Poland simply got invaded and turned into a war zone by Germany and Russia - just like hundreds of other countries in history. Perhaps the Polish flag looks too damn cheap...I really don't know, the only times Poland appears in the media is when they whine about either Germany or Russia or act ungrateful towards the EU.

Huh, you know, come to think of it, hardly ANYTHING about WW1 is ever taught. Pretty sure a good lot of schools end up teaching WWII before WWI (if they teach about WWI atall). I mean yeah, WWII was definitely a good lot more important in terms of technology developed and was a general turning point for the entire world, but WWI set the stage for WWII- you'd think they'd teach it first to set an understanding as to WHY Germany was the way they were in WWII... people seem to think Germany just suddenly become super assholes and were the devil, lol.

Actually Russia was most directly responsible for WWI. Until Russia acted, it looked like it was going to be a small-scale war between the Austrians and the Serbs (over the assassination of Francis Ferdinand). Russia wanted control of the straits and didnt want to lose its influence in the Balkans, and acted in defense of the Serbs. Russia started mobilizing for war early, and thus forced Germany to declare war, for the sake of its own national security as well as for the sake of its ally, Austria.

Germany, however, was entirely responsible for WWII.

Yeah, you're right. Russia should have just left it's allies to suffer and die without fulfilling the terms of their treaties. I like how Germany is only mobilizing to defend it's ally but Russia is always the big bad aggressor. That's so 1950s of you.

For the record, Russia already had close ties with most of the nations in the Balkans almost a century prior. My homeland of Bulgaria was liberated from the Turks with the help from the Russians. They don't need to attack anything to "gain control of the straits", unless you mean attacking Turkey in which case probably, but nobody likes Turkey anyway so nobody would have cared.

Mobilizing for war is not the same thing as starting a war. Don't confuse the two.

One might make a case that Serbia started the war since it was a Serb that assassinated Ferdinand. One might argue it was Austria for antagonizing Serbia in the first place. Most likely, one would say it was Germany since they were the first of the major participants to actually declare war on another and attack. However, one cannot blame Russia for starting the war on the basis that they prepared to have one (And rightly so, since they had war declared upon them soon afterward).

However, one cannot blame Russia for starting the war on the basis that they prepared to have one (And rightly so, since they had war declared upon them soon afterward).

As I've said before, before the intervention of Russia, it seemed that it would be a small-scale war between Serbia and Austria. And yes, you can blame Russia for mobilizing for war before declaring it. Thats pretty stupid on their part, as they basically preempted Germany into declaring war.

LOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOL

Tell me this then, Mr. LOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOL, what did they get in return?

We've been over this before. The Russian's wanted access to the Straits, and thats why they helped the Bulgarian's defeat the Turks. The only reason they wernt able to seize the Straits is because of the intervention of Britain and Austria.

SoQRadio wrote on Fri, 20 November 2009 14:18 Because Russia did not want to be seen as aggressive in the eyes of Britain and Austria. Essentially, in a world where alliances meant everything, they wanted to avoid isolation.

If that were the case, why launch the war without international support in the first place? It's one or the other. You can't have it both ways.

SoQRadio wrote on Fri, 20 November 2009 14:18 Uh, if I were Germany, I would be worried if the country next door, who I am not on great terms with, starts massing troops at my boarder.

And a proper response would be to mobilize as well and prepare for some kind of defensive action. An improper response would be to preemptively declare war and attack first, yet that's just what Germany did.

SoQRadio wrote on Fri, 20 November 2009 14:18 Thats pretty stupid on their part, as they basically preempted Germany into declaring war.

No they didn't. Nobody forced Germany's hand. They could have kept their troops on their side of the border in defense and everything would have been cool. You're just trying to find some kind of way to incriminate Russia because of some impotent rage you have toward the country.

SoQRadio wrote on Fri, 20 November 2009 14:18 We've been over this before. The Russian's wanted access to the Straits, and thats why they helped the Bulgarian's defeat the Turks. The only reason they wernt able to seize the Straits is because of the intervention of Britain and Austria.

You're saying what they WANTED to get. I'm asking what they DID get. The war was a success on Russia's part, and I find it hard to believe that the only thing that would keep them from accomplishing their goals is a foreseeable predictable political situation that they no doubt prepared for.

Exactly, I typed the word Bulgaria because the four preceding posts mention Bulgaria, when we should be talking about Serbia. Just ditch the bullshit.

Why write it? Just replace the word 'Bulgaria' with the word 'Serbia' and you get a coherent argument relevant to the WW1 discussion (unlike your excursus on Bulgaria). Why would I notice a typo before the dweeb points it out? Yes, you've clearly got my elaborate ploy all figured out..

McCarthy probably thought quite highly of the Czar, so that whole angle seems irrelevant - no need to name-drop Bulgaria any longer. Pan-Slavism really doesn't matter here, whether the Czar wanted to support his Slavic brothers or keep Austro-Hungary from taking that territory, he approved of the mobilization that triggered WW1. Realistically, those two and many other factors played a role, to assume anything else is causal oversimplification. Singling out Germany is laughable and shows a poor understanding of history - if one really feels the need to oversimplify the issue, then he should rather blame Russia and Austro-Hungary.

How exactly did I word it? Like I said, just replace 'Bulgaria' with 'Serbia' and it makes perfect sense...hardly reason for you to stay up until 5 AM .

1. You're taking all the blame off Russia, which was the first great power to mobilize it's forces against another.
2. You're instead putting most of the blame on Germany for reacting to this mobilization with a formal declaration of war.
3. You're holding Yugoslavia (you're saying Serbia, but I can't be bothered to freak out on someone for mixing up country names) as a whole accountable because a Serb killed Franz Ferdinand.

Bottom line, your reasoning is almost as ignorant as declaring the field of inductive reasoning obsolete...

Not all the blame, but I do disagree with SoQRadio's assertion that Russia is most to blame. You and him both make the lazy intellectual mistake of confusing "Mobilize" with "Attack".

JohnDoe wrote on Sat, 21 November 2009 06:522. You're instead putting most of the blame on Germany for reacting to this mobilization with a formal declaration of war.

Yes. That elevates things. A formal declaration of war is far more aggressive than simply "mobilizing". For example, the US "mobilizes" against nations all the time, most recently in some clusterfuck with some North Korean ships or something. Yet you don't see any World Wars starting there yet, do you?

Beyond simply declaring war, they were also the first to attack and invade. From a purely military standpoint there's nothing wrong with that, and there's even some advantage to be had, but politically it doesn't look good, and earns you a majority blame.

Yeah. This happens all the time, like Afghanistan being held responsible for the 9/11 attacks, or the "nation" of Palestine being held responsible for the 1972 Munich massacre. This is the way blame for terrorist attacks (Like the assassination of Ferdinand) works.

SoQRadio wrote on Thu, 19 November 2009 17:23 Actually Russia was most directly responsible for WWI. Until Russia acted, it looked like it was going to be a small-scale war between the Austrians and the Serbs (over the assassination of Francis Ferdinand). Russia wanted control of the straits and didnt want to lose its influence in the Balkans, and acted in defense of the Serbs. Russia started mobilizing for war early, and thus forced Germany to declare war, for the sake of its own national security as well as for the sake of its ally, Austria.

You replied with an analogy of how Russia came to the rescue of another slavic nation (Bulgaria). This dummy actually forgot what he was arguing about...jeez

1&2 Lazy intellectual mistake, huh? That's rich coming from you, clearly not aware of the great powers being at the brink or war even before Franz Ferdinand was shot. Mobilizing meant that war was now inevitable, comparing this with a current scenario instead of looking at the historical context is exactly that, a lazy intellectual mistake.

3 The Taliban regime was actively supporting Al Queda, while Franz Ferdinand's assassin was a rogue freedom fighter, but that's besides the point - it doesn't matter who Austro-Hungary blamed when evaluating history. Hitler blamed Poland for attacking Germany first, so do you agree with that as well?

JohnDoe wrote on Sat, 21 November 2009 11:16Mobilizing meant that war was now inevitable, comparing this with a current scenario instead of looking at the historical context is exactly that, a lazy intellectual mistake.

Bullshit. If you can mobilize without going to war in modern times (Especially in the age of weapons of mass destruction), then there's no reason not to be able to do so then. The will not to go to war simply wasn't there, and the great powers have nobody to blame for that but themselves.

JohnDoe wrote on Sat, 21 November 2009 11:163 The Taliban regime was actively supporting Al Queda, while Franz Ferdinand's assassin was a rogue freedom fighter,

I'd agree then half of poland suck balls but theres a second half which is good so thats why people say it suck.

Give more reason, every country has some kind of disadvantages that make people look at it like it sucks badly. But one country have more of it while one have less.

Poland hasn't produced SHIT lately. The only good things to come out of Poland were a few people in history ages ago (Chopin, Copernicus, etc). Nowadays they're too busy BAWWWWWing about the holocaust and producing a grand total of about nothing useful.

Also, lol, I'm fat and suck cock and pay too much for gas? The last one's true (except I avoid driving at all costs), but that's hardly my fault. The first two are probably the most pathetic insults you could come up with. I guess that's another reason why Poland sucks.

i skipped the 2nd page of this discussion but ww1 as i saw earlier posted was started by the serbs more specifically by a group called the black hand (I always wonder if the renegade creators stole that name). with the assassination of the arch duke of Austria Hungry, they were obviously pissed and retaliated against Serbia, as a result, the Russians who were Serbias ally stepped in to back them up. this resulted in Germany entering the war. Now because russia france and britian were all allies (the triple entente)foreseeing the threat of france entering the war shortly after russia entering, germany attacked france through beligum against the Maginot line. because beligum was a neutral country, britian already had a deal with the beligians to protect their neutral sovereignty and this brought the brits into the war. I cant remember how far into it but eventually the Germans and Austria-Hungarians brought the surrender of the russians bringing about the poor conditions that gave a birthing to communism in its most extreme form to be followed up by joseph stalin.

Germany initially also striked france because the two countries throughout history had always been bitter rivals and so this whole mess gave them a fairly decent excuse to go after the enemy they always wanted to defeat once and for all, france. America entered later. and Poland sucks

Hey... I live in America and I'm not fat .

Anyway, that reminded me of something I learned a few days ago.

It turns out, that even though fatty foods from places like McDonalds do cause overweight problems in many American citizens... the real reason why so many Americans are fat does not lie in the consumers themselves (or there self control, whatever you want to call it), but rather the sources of the food.

Processed food and drink, or anything wrapped in a wrapper with a nutrition label on it, is made with synthesized ingredients. To put it simply, the real actual ingredients are more expensive than these synthesized stuff... so they opt to go the cheaper route. Ingredients, such as sugar, are often replaced with cheaper synthetic substitutes. It is these substitutes that causes fat buildup in consumers.

So, the next time you think about mentioning fat Americans, think again, because you aren't directly insulting the consumers, but rather, the people who put the 'fake' food on the market.

I sense VERY LARGE AMOUNTS of irony in this noted section.

Oh, and also, only males were allowed to migrate from country to country? Interesting, considering that the German Nazis were trying to export ALL of the Jewish population.

Also, I find it funny that we're called "fat Americans" when most the people in my town are skinny or have some muscular build, AND born in the USA.

I'm not 'stealing' him as I'm not Prussian. My mother is Bavarian and my father is American with mostly Anglo-Saxon ancestry. Your typical whimsical Polish lack of self-esteem is telling you to project today's nationalism onto history, while the concept of the nation state didn't even exist back then. Copernicus wrote all of his work in German and Latin - it's unclear whether he even spoke Polish as his father died when he was young and he had little connection to that side of his family.
