Oops, you'd be right about the monster. But some called him "frankenstein's monster" (as was the name of the book), so you may say he was frankenstein Jr. since he was never actually given a name.

Well, that said a good SAT is a score of 1,200 points, but would that mean 1200/1200? Scottish schools don't even do SAT tests, so I have no idea.

Yep, IQ scores aren't that accurate when you relate them to intelligence. Although they "do" show you that these people can do the math, so they can't be completely dumb. We get an IQ test on T.V. about once every year, (hosted by a bitch for talking sakes) offering anyone a serious of questions and a scale at the end to tell them how intelligent they are. There are always groups in the audience too, real stereotypes like "blondes" "brunettes", people that work in construction, other trades and the like, that take the test and get rated too. They do insist the score isn't an actual indication of how smart you are, but there ya go. Most of the questions are based around logic, mathematical problems, or things like putting the right word into a sentence, or what one word really means in a sentence, etc.. perhaps it means that these people you went to school with were just smart when they felt like it.

Edit: oh by the way, about that 2 clause thing.. you were right. 2 dependant clauses can't be used with a comma in between (I believe that was the argument) but they can be used without a comma.
