Yes very sad. I have always been a fan of the Superman comic, and the movies (in fact I have the DVD collectors edition.), and have always thought Chistopher Reeve as a person was very brave for how he handled his disability. He was one lucky person in a sense that most people who break their neck either just die, or spend the rest of their lives in a bed hooked up to machines. He wouldn't have that, and demanded to be mobile and to undergo daily physical therapy...he was certain he would one day walk again. He thought stem cells would be the answer, but he was slowly doing it himself. He was able to move his finger and some feeling was returning to his body.

Anyhow, its sad to see someone who has fought so hard to be alive succumb to heart failure.
R.I.P.
