splnwezellf what you think is true, then shouldn't the question be: Why not just nuke Iraq? Forget about them not surrendering. Is easier to nuke the place and forget about resistance. Heck, nuke Afghanistan so we can bring our troops back...

That is a completely different situation here. Why would we want to nuke those who we're liberating? We weren't liberating Japan.

It's a completely different situation if they would have attacked us. No, not because I'm American, but rather because of the way that Americans operate. Our government wouldn't train the women and children to attack the enemy or feel that we're dishonoring the president by surrendering.

Let's say, hypothetically, that America was in the same mindset as Japan was. Of course, I wouldn't like the idea of an atom bomb being dropped on us, but from a military standpoint, it was the smartest thing they could do. The point of a war is not to die for your country, but make the enemy die for his (Yeah, I got it off of a quote).
