DarkDeminhidden... but still on the internet. Making it public domain. Kthxdie

I work for a Finance company in Tech Support.

One of the partners of the company have a huge database with practically everybodies personal information (Name, address, DOB, Income, etc..) within the UK & Ireland.

I won't say the company name as I am not allowed to.

But they recently moved from software to web-based.

So all Collectors no longer use software, but the internet to access this onfo.

To be able to withhold this information, they must have a certificate to install on IE. Without the certificate, Access Denied.

Even though all of this information is on the internet, anybody with un-authorized access can be taken to court.

This is a factual metaphor for the data leaked from Reborn forums.

Sure it might not be all the users credit card information.

But things are password and/or permission protected for a reason on the net and they are not for public viewing.

As this is only an image there is pretty much nothing you can do.

However, private data was breached. But I don't know the procedure for that. IMO as this is not an official forum to which has legal rights (i.e. one owned by EA or Nokia for example) there isn't much you can do either.
