Luckily I'm a student. They don't want to spend time to secure the internet since we have to much ICT students like me who need the freedom for our study, and are able to hack our way out of it anyway. Some security problems were quit funny.

After a coffee machine crashed, we plugged the thing back in so we could use it in. While rebooting the system we found out the IP adres of the machines system that was needed for our schools digitsal payment system. So we of cource tried to start a tellnet session with the machine, and to our suprise we actually got acces to some program on the machine using tellnet.

We couldn't really find out how the program worked, it had some problems. And it seemed to crash after we played with some contrast settings, but it was funny none the less.
