Lol, that's completely ridiculous, and utterly useless (and it looks fake). Mainly because it's just a handgun on the front of a medium machine gun body, you have the weight of a medium machine gun (about 20 pounds, plus whatever the rest of the crap on it adds) with the firepower of a pistol.

Also, there's already technology that can allow soldiers to shoot around a corner with accuracy without revealing themselves, one example is the (still experimental, I think) landwarrior system, where there's a camera attached to a normal assault rifle (like the M16, and maybe the new HK M8) that transmits the image to the soldiers helmet.

Wait, why does it call it a 40mm grenade launcher, when it's just a pistol (a Glock in this case), with a tactical light (and a laser?) attached below it?
