So, what's the problem? It's just banning the sale of violent video games (which is intended to be and will be interpreted as M+ rated games) to children, which already can't buy M rated games at most retail/game stores, so it's really not changing that much. This isn't banning the use of M rated games by children, or ordering the developers to censor themselves, this is only forcing parents to buy the M rated games for their children instead of allowing the children to come in and get it themselves.
