Quote:Like I demonstrated, one could make a similar argument in the case of cheating. Here, he's insulting me for taking issue with someone DDoS'ing me in a N00bstories Renalert server, saying I should "get over it" and "it happens every day" and whatnot. You could construct a similar scenario with a cheater in a N00bstories server pre-Renguard days.

If I complain that so-and-so was cheating in the N00bstories server, and he comes along and says that cheating is an everyday occurrence and that I shouldn't demand anything be done about it, he can't therefore go out and support any action taken against cheaters by-and-large, such as Renguard.

We could just use his own arguments against him and tell him to "STFU and read a book" when he's being cheated against in a game instead of supporting him in demanding that something be done about those cheaters.

Sure, but if he currently supports Renguard, he would not be a hypocrite. Now, if he DID make that argument regarding cheating, then I could see your point. (Though "Hypocrite" would be the wrong word to use, I see what you are getting at).

However, simply drawing a parallel to arguments that could be made regarding other things does not make it his argument; hence why I asked the question.

HE didn't make the statement, even though the parallel could be made. Heck, if that's the case, we're all hypocrites because anything we say can be paralleled to something else.
