Subject: Re: "Protecting" kids who are unable to tell fantasy from reality
Posted by cheesesoda on Fri, 15 Dec 2006 15:30:52 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

I like the V-chips on TVs. They tell you what is basically included in the programs that you're watching. However, I think with the V-chip, any other censoring should be removed. If you're a parent and don't want your children seeing that, block it with the options on your TVs. If you don't have that, don't let your children watch TV unless you can be there to supervise. It won't kill the kid to not watch TV. If you don't want to see that language or even nudity, don't watch it. You're obviously not a child, and should be responsible enough to choose not to watch something you dislike or find offensive.

Censorship just gives the government control, and that's annoying, too. I mean, if we let the government control what we watch or do, what's next? Are we going to let them wipe our butts after we go to the bathroom?