Your just breaking a few rules we use on the forums, (well the internet really) nothing serious but for veterans like us it can get amusing

We don't expect you to just know these things right off but you will pick them up in time. For instance:

1. You double/triple posted all over the place. A person is supposed to use the edit button unless they need a bump for one reason or another. This isn't an instant messenger so don't make a habit out of just posting reply after reply until someone talks back.

2. One topic is usually enough to cover a problem. It's ok that you had a topic in the mod section and general section but they were very closely related and could of just been in one topic. Also if you have just something general to say and you already have a topic that is being watched and used, it's ok to ask another question in that same topic.

3. Spelling and grammar, I know your 14 or so and spelling isn't at all on the top of your list but try to make an effort to type as well as possible and in a way that gets the message across. I myself use way too many comma's but I work on it. Also note the spell-check button at the bottom, it is a good idea to run your post through it before submitting.

Thats all I think you did thats kinda pas say around here or on the internet in general. Don't worry about it though, we understand.
