Oblivion165 wrote on Sat, 20 October 2007 01:35E) God forbid we have enough buttons on out mouse to game. My mouse has 6 buttons on it and I still want more. Try playing Call of Duty 2 with a single click mouse....oh wait you cant without your windows partition.

Sorry, that's just a great big fat pile of shit right there.

The Apple Mighty Mouse comes with 5 (YES!!!! FIVE!!!!) buttons. A left one, and right one (under one shell, and by default they're assigned to the same function, but you can change them and it's not hard), two either side, which is mainly used for Expose but you can reassign those too, and a middle mouse button when you hold the trackball in and click.

The Apple Trackpad is FAR better than any other laptop trackpads. It's large, and supports multitouch so you don't have a sectioned of part for scrolling (you just hold one finger on the pad, then drag the other up, down, left, right to scroll). Right clicking as as simple as tapping two fingers on it at once.

Also, to answer Aprimes question...

My version of OS X has decided to be "gay" on me because:

1. It likes to randomly choose applications as the active one, when i click an inactive window.
2. It likes to hog RAM, making other applications run slow.
3. It likes to not do what i tell it to, instead do the oppesit (me: "close 'this' app" The OS: "OS X is now closing 'that' app" me: "NO I WANT THAT ONE!")
4. WTF is a kernel panic, and why does MSN 6.2.3 cause them?
5. Other reasons in which i can't remember at this moment in time.

Besides those points, which many of them are bugs only on my end (no-one else has them), OS X is fine. In some cases, better than Windows.
