I use both Firefox and Opera. Opera, I find, is better for downloading and such, and can load some pages which give Firefox trouble. Firefox, on the other hand, seems to load pages a lot faster and, since I have it loaded with NoScript and other plugins, it has also become my secure browser. I might just look into grabbing a copy of Safari, as well, now that it's available for Windows.

IE, no matter the version, can pretty much load any page ever made, but it is crash-happy and full of security holes. I'm a browser security freak, so I hate IE with a fiery loathing passion- enough to have removed all the executables from my comp and set every possible program to use Firefor or Opera instead. I've even, on occasion, been known to delete IE .exe's from the desktops and startup menus of any public access computer I use- provided it already has another browser installed, that is. I can't stand that damned program...
