ITT (I think) is one of those more commercial small colleges that you might see on a TV commercial.

MIT (as far as I know, and at least when I refer to it) is the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, world-known for being a notoriously difficult school to get into, as well as for the top-notch engineers and scientists it produces. It's where all those hackers in every movie you've ever seen about some computer hacker went to college.

I haven't looked into ITT much (at all really), but my guess would be that they generally stick to the necessities for your degree. You might get out faster, but that's because you're not taking the general-education classes that many larger colleges require in order to produce a more well-rounded person. Because many employers value a well-rounded graduate, they will choose someone with a degree from a big college over one from a school like ITT.
