

---

Subject: A bit of perspective for all you "intellectuals".

Posted by Azrielstoneheart on Mon, 28 Jul 2003 21:54:49 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

Do you believe what you are told by science? If so, then you believe that which you are told by beings you have previously admitted to being fallible. As such, why would science be any more accurate than the Bible? In fact, science has a way of being so far off the truth that it sets itself back with misinterpreted information and false laws. For instance, for a long time spontaneous generation was considered to be scientific fact. However, we know today that this is in fact impossible. Science cannot answer all of the questions because science is bound by man. Man has a flawed nature, and therefore all that he does will be flawed. Many prominent scientists themselves believe that there is some form of higher power in the universe. Just ask an astronomer, a physicist, a biologist, or a chemist. Many will tell you that the world is too complex, too well defined, too structured to have formed without some kind of plan and guidance. Plus, many of the prophecies in the Bible continue to come true. If you don't believe me, do some research in Revelation. The mark of the beast, usable for money, information transferring, and tracking people. Now look up digital angel on the net. Tell me what similarities you find. They should shock you. One world government...coming about. One world currency, look at the euro. One world religion...the U.N. already has a council in place determining the basis for such a thing. Show me a liar, and I will show you another.

---