We do not appear to be noting the point of the topic, we're devolving into pointsfix related arguments, and this has nothing to do with that.

This might be clearer if I had made the post, as I have no TT involvement, or "pointsfix-pushing" history etc etc etc.

The question is: Why does Jelly (Yes, I know that he registered them first, let me finish) get to control the top half of the server listing? That puts the power of who gets the bulk of the newer players into their servers into Jelly's hands, new players make or break new communities. Why is Jelly responsible for that? (I feel I should point out I play at Jelly, and have done for some time, I was even on the temp list for a while)

It's quite simple, why does the fact that Jelly was first to register the nicknames give him the right to decide who gets the bulk of new player influx. I wouldn't be asking if he registered the top two or three, he's got 7? 8? Jelly doesn't host that many servers, that appears, to me, disproportional.

With NO mention of pointsfix please answer the question:

Why does Jelly get to decide which (new) communities get the newer players?

(My reasons for coming to the conclusion that newer players join the one of the first servers they see are too obvious to be typed out)

Edit at Jelly himself, I think Spoony finds it "shady" that any deals relating to which servers get more exposure are carried out in private. Given that coming to you directly does not put the conversation into a public forum such as this one is what is irking Spoony, I would think.
