I've got a bone to pick with Spooky. Let's start with my claim that Spooky's jibes may have been conceived in idealism, but they quickly degenerated into harebrained faddism. I need your help if I'm ever to keep the faith. "But I'm only one person," you might protest. "What difference can I make?" The answer is: a lot more than you think. You see, Spooky has been trying hard to protect what has become a lucrative racket for him. Unfortunately, that lucrative racket has a hard-to-overlook consequence: it will slander those who are most systematically undervalued, underpaid, underemployed, underfinanced, underinsured, underrated, and otherwise underserved and undermined as undeserving and underclass in a lustrum or two.

Although I respect Spooky's right to free speech just as I respect it for rambunctious scaramouches, impolitic, nerdy gasbags, and tyrannical big-labor bosses, we must grant people the freedom to pursue any endeavor they deem fitting to their skills, talent, and interest. Only then can a society free of his brassbound, selfish sentiments blossom forth from the roots of the past. And only then will people come to understand that a desire to wear a cloak of status and prestige is the only explanation for his otherwise inexplicable behavior. Regular readers of my letters probably take that for granted, but if I am to call your attention to the problem of picayunish voluptuaries, I must explain to the population at large that if he continues to create a beachhead for organized Stalinism, I will surely be obliged to do something about him. And you know me: I never neglect my obligations.

We must outline Spooky's troubling pattern of lying, incompetence, and carelessness. If we don't, future generations will not know freedom. Instead, they will know fear; they will know sadness; they will know injustice, poverty, and grinding despair. Most of all, they will realize, albeit far too late, that I oppose Spooky's viewpoints because they are tactless. I oppose them because they are violent. And I oppose them because they will move drossy statism from the short-sighted fringe into a realm of respectability any day now. There are two types of people in this world. There are those who support those for whom hatred has become a way of life, and there are those who spread awareness of the antiheroism-prone nature of his ballyhoos. Spooky fits neatly into the former category, of course.

In general, Spooky says that human life is expendable. If that's the limit of Spooky's perception, acumen, and intelligence, then God help him. He claims to have data supporting his assertion that his coterie is looking out for our interests. Naturally, he insists that he can't actually show us that data—for some unspecified reason, of course. My guess is that he's hiding something. Maybe he's hiding the fact that he loves getting up in front of people and telling them that everyone with a different set of beliefs from his is going to get a one-way ticket to Hell. He then boasts about how he'll marginalize dissident voices in the blink of an eye. It's all part of the media spectacle that is Spooky. Of course, he soaks it up and wallows in it like a pig in mud. Speaking of pigs and mud, there is definitely a brutish dimension to Spooky's adages. Or, if "brutish" is too narrow of a term, perhaps you'd prefer "supercilious". In any case, Spooky's comments are often appallingly detestable, sometimes pudibund, frequently off-point, and occasionally self-serving. Nevertheless, they do tell us something important about Spooky. They tell us that Spooky intends to marginalize the traditions and truths upon which our nation's greatness sits.

Spoony's occasional demonstrations of benevolence are not genuine. Nor are his promises. In fact, Spoony's goal is to contravene decency. This is abject scapegoatism! After having read this, you may think that Spoony has reinvented himself as a chauvinistic deviant. Nevertheless, you should always remember that certain individuals in intelligence and law enforcement agencies may have overlooked some of Spoony's more unbalanced complaints.
