Dave Anderson wrote on Sat, 20 March 2010 01:31 I went to one called BodyWorlds or something when it was in Denver, CO. I believe it was the very first one. For those who are actually intersted in learning about the human anatomy, it is a well worth experience. I don't really recommend it for the immature or light-weights, because these were actually real people that are preserved (I forgot the name that they call it, plasticized or something).

it can be a disturbing sight but as you said if your interested it is a very good learning experience... there were a few immature people at the exhibition they were eventually kicked out for stupidity and My Ex GF went in and she flipped out and puked so yea... id say she was a light-weight... I found it interesting... as for what its called im looking that up currently
