I understand it was a last resort. I just wanted to place the warning for future reference and for if the guy ran into any other problems later.

So after extracting, the installer worked? Interesting. That also solves the issues I was describing in my previous post. Almost sounds like the installer installed a corrupt version of mixcheck.exe... Not sure what happened, but either way, good to head that the problem is solved for this person. If it happens again for anyone else reading this in the future, they should probably post about it so that TT can attempt to find the exact reason and solve it for good.
