Nice try, Ethenal.

I think I am being very fair. I find it offensive to have my post misconstrued and pushed into the realms of genuine anti-Semitism.

I merely wrote on where a certain idea originated. If I were to tell you how I, a brown-skinned Tamil from a strange land you have never heard about can speak and write English, I would point to the European trade excursions of your forefathers that resulted in what you are seeing in me today. If I were a pure Tamil thinking with a pure Tamil mind, my thoughts would be so alien to you that you wouldn't understand anything. Let's not start about the language barrier.

The cultural devastation and the benefits that occur when two alien societies clash is something to be loathed and admired at the same time.

Likewise, Munzer's quote was simply a reflection of the state of European society at the start of the 20th Century and the immense role of the Jewish cultural impact on the development of Western society.

It is bad taste to dismiss that as a "Jewlluminati conspiracy." Even for a joke.
