Terran_DroneWarranto, I DO realize. What I also realize is that in the real world companies aren't so childish. They do compare eachothers products and call their own better, but they never start flaming and calling eachother's products names. Not in public, not behind the scenes. Now you can keep on nitpicking about the details of my argumentation or you can resign on it and realise you won't come far being childish.

Ah! A psychic! I would really like to know how you are able to find out what goes on behind the scenes. I never said being childish will get you anywhere, nor have I disagreed with you on that topic. However, you continue to be wrong. Take my commercial example again. How is a company going, "our product is better, all others are inferior. So buy our stuff!", NOT calling other products names? Sure they don't mention the "others" by name, most of the time, but competition is all about saying how much your product is better than the other persons by showing how inferior it is.

At least you stopped your attempt to know how the marketing world works.

Oh, and by the way, people make a living by others complaining about products. Thats how businesses go bankrupt, quality of products increase, and members of any 'better business' company are able to get paid.
