AircraftkillerI still find it a term that seems to undervalue the importance of texture work.

I've seen Japanese companies that misspell English all the time, but that doesn't make "English" correct.

Oh but it does, when "Donkey Kong" was released in the states it was misstranslated. The original name was "Monkey Kong." This is a perfect example of something misspelled, but it works out in the end. This skin and texture thing is becoming petty now. It only seems that it is brought up by someone who wants attention. Help AAK625 out here, this thread was not made for you guys to argue your damn vocabulary. Here in the interent world skin and texture are virtual the same thing. We are not going to write a doctoral thesis about them, so just fucking stop with it.

Oh hell lets have fun with this. Here are two words that a the same thing.

Pronunciation: 'win(d)-"skrEn

Function: noun

1 : a screen that protects against the wind

Pronunciation: 'win(d)-"shEld

Function: noun

: a transparent screen (as of glass) in front of the occupants of a vehicle

Now one is British and one is "American," if you will. Now, are you going to tell me you are going to correct ever British person, or American, that uses one of these terms? The answer is no. These definitions are distinctly different, but you know what? They are the fuckin same thing.
