hydra1945Britain has been one of our strongest allies in the War on Terror and one of Bush's biggest supporters. It also sent thousands of its own troops to help out in the war in Iraq.

Without the help of the British, gaining world support would have been a much more difficult task for George W. Bush, but with its help he managed to get dozens of countries (I forget the exact number, but it was over twenty) to help us out in the ousting of a madman and making the world a safer place.

Raises beer mug Here's to Britain!

That ain't exactly world support ... over twenty countries? That's nothing. The only countries that did anything besides sign their name to a "Coalition" was the Brits and Spain, who obviously isn't quite as helpful anymore. Don't know where you get the idea that we have world support.

And how do you Brits feel about the Iraq war? I'm not gonna get into it too much here because 95% of the forum is conservative and there's no point in trying, but I just wanted a general consensus of your opinions.
