Actually they did make boats out of concrete in WWII, go look it up.

As for the destroyer it looks fine to me. Naval ships are scraped down for rust regularly to keep hull integrity at its peak. The only time they build up rust is sitting in mothballs.

The only slight detail I think would fit but is not necessary is the camo pattern which British and US warships used during WWII but again its not necessary.

Naval ships try to attract the LEAST amount of attention possible hence why they all tend to look like piles of grey metal with a door or window here or there.
