If your browser cant handle that site, then its time to upgrade.

It's even complaining about the Flash Generated, embeded code.

There is nothing wrong with an iframe. I can do the old fashion way of using frames, but who would want to?

And your out anyway, you like netscape. Now your word is worth shit nothing.

If you're going to use an iframe, make sure you don't use percentages. It fucks up in Firefox. You need to do the size by pixel, not percent. Although it may seem impossible, it actually makes that site look better.

Hmm this is a thought that occored to me, that other browsers may not display them like mine does. Pixel by Pixel is of course the best way, but impossible with all the different res people use. Is this what it looks like in yours?

When i originally went to design this i was wanting a letterbox look, it still kinda does.

Of course it will look better, due to popular demand ill make a new site for them:

If you're going to make a site w/o exact specifications...don't use an IFrame. Your layout can easily be done in a table or CSS and look phenominally better.

It's not about tastes. The html part of the site should be only content. Style sheets are meant for presentation.

I have an up to date browser. I'm running mozilla firefox on Fedora.

w3 are standards set so that your HTML will show up properly on all browsers. I know its a pain in the ass to look at and think how much work has to be redone because I was introduced to standards a year ago and I was pissed. I guess I had a good reason though seeing as how I didn't have page headers or footers setup yet so I had to manually edit just under a hundred pages....

Seeing as we have 3 professional designers and 2 illustrators and of course 1 head developer, i think that our designs would leave you guys for dead.

BUT, i'm not even going to try to argue because we currently have over 200 jobs so we couldn't even fit you in, lol.

Exactly when do you consider someone a pro at designing? I don't think there is such a thing, you can always expand yourself and get better, saying someone is a pro to me just means they do it for a living, something that you can say "We have pro's" because guess what, we could have people just as good but they can't get the name pro simply because of age.
