Quote:3: an outer surface (usually thin); "the skin of an airplane"

Helps when you quote the entire thing.

Something you can touch has different meanings than something intangible.
to something tangible, texture is how it feels, while skin is the substance covering the object.

When it comes to the world of computer generated models. However when texture is applied to the computer world, it does have a distinct definition, unlike skin.

Quote:texture

<graphics> A measure of the variation of the intensity of a surface, quantifying properties such as smoothness, coarseness and regularity. It's often used as a region descriptor in image analysis and computer vision.

Admittedly, Aircraftkiller doesn't always have to point out the correct terminology, but he is right. Whether you like him/hate him/whatever, he wins this round.

Though, the next time someone comes into the forum that doesn't speak proper English, or incomprehensible "leet speak", no one had better correct him, as then you'd all be hypocrites for getting after aircraftkiller for doing this to you.

You're right, the Internet isn't an English class.

But you know what it IS?

It's a place where the main means of communication is language, and here, it's the English language, and if you can't use it correctly, you're shit out of luck.

Let me relate to you a story, kiddos. Today in my English class, we were correcting people's papers that other people in our class had written. Do you know what I came across? That's right. Someone had written "u" instead of "you" in their paper. So I turned to him, and I said: "Robby, You might want to spell out the word 'you' in your sentences." And do you have any idea what his response was?

"Oh, haha, I probably shouldn't chat on AIM when I do my homework."

It was just as I had predicted. Do not fool yourselves into thinking you can molest my language and that it's my job to try and insinuate a meaning out of your horrible solecisms.

The moral?

Don't be gay.

"Skin" also can generally mean something that is covering something else. People refer to textures as "skins" because they are visualizing it as being the outer layer, covering, or "skin" of the model underneath.

Just because you say "skin" doesn't necessarily mean it has to do with animal skin, for example (no pun intended): <http://www.google.com/search?hl=en&q=aircraft+skin&btnG=Google+Search>

To some extent, understanding is what's most important. However, that doesn't necessarily make it the proper way to spell/speak/whatever.

To be more to the point is understanding all that matters? Perhaps, unfortunately, society is more accepting of stupidity than intelligence. And that's what all those examples show. A complete absence of intellect.

It's a WIDELY used and known term for the person that applies textures to a model. I could care less if a "game university" has a "texturing" class, or if the word "texture" in the dictionary has a definition that matches the description.. You simply can't argue that the term has been used and accepted since the earliest days of FPS games. This isn't something new that people began saying as slang, and now need corrected on.. I would argue that it was the original term for the process, and someone just decided that "texture artist" sounded better than "skinner".

Slang is slang. It may be an accepted term to use, but it doesn't make it any less "proper". I'm not saying it's completely and utterly wrong to use it, it just shows a lower intellect to argue that anything else is wrong, as some people appear to be doing when they come up with stuff such as "no one cares", and "everyone else does it".

Heck, even I use slang. In Canada, theft is not called theft; it's actually called "conversion", but everyone still calls it theft. Does that mean theft is the incorrect term to use? Yes, it is. However it's a common phrase, so people use it. It doesn't make it any better, though, when it is supposed to be called conversion.

Perhpas to clarify some point to avoid confusion. Slang isn't wrong, as it is a generally accepted form to use. It's simply not proper to use slang over the correct term. The "lack of intellect" simply refers to people using arguments against the proper use of the term, not the use of the term itself.

I'm not attempting to argue that it is absolutely wrong to use, but rather that having Aircraftkiller correct people isn't wrong either, as it is proper to use the correct term rather than slang.

According to Discreet's Gmax User Reference, skins are the 3D mesh itself and not the texture applied onto it. A quick search of the user reference for the word 'skin' returns 18 entries. 17 of the 18 are all referring to the 3D mesh of a model or modifiers that bend that 3D mesh. 1 of the 18 entries uses the word skin like this:

Quote:Bitmaps are useful for creating many kinds of materials, from wood grains and wall surfaces to skin and feathers.

Quite literally referring to the look of biological skin and the way bitmaps can mimic the appearance. It would appear that in the documentation Discreet provided for the public, they do not consider a skin to be a texture. They define it as the mesh of the model itself.

Feel free to ignore me though, everyone else seems to when I bring this up.

msgtpaintIt's a WIDELY used and known term for the person that applies textures to a model.

Umm... so? Because it's widely used to refer to a type of person... does that mean it's not slang? Not really. The argument here lies in the use of formal and informal English, and since we're all online communicating in a way that is otherwise informal just about all of the time, "skin" is acceptable. People know what you're talking about because, as you said, it's a widely used term.

But you will likely not see a "skinner" in the credits in a video game, if you know what I mean.

But nobody cares either if it is the correct word. (Besides ACK).

Its a very widely used term across the gaming industry. If you tell someone "Hey, I downloaded a skin," or, "Hey, I'm going to make a skin," Then they will understand you. If you tell someone "Hey, I'm going to download a tex..." Then it's not the same is it?

If I was refering to an animal skin, I would say animal skin.

If you can't understand what someone is refering to from the context, then you have issues that need ironing out.

Also, I want to add that skin only refers to the texture that is on a vehicle or a character. The ground does not have a skin, it has a texture.

Skin is more specific.

AircraftkillerIf I were a texture, I'd be offended at being compared to an animal skin.

What... the... fuck are you shittin on about now, a skin is a god damn skin, if I was to call it a skin or a texture you would know what I was talking about, so what's the point in arguing a stupid bullshit point all over again. Yes if you want to get technical (which many people don't) a skin in terms of modelling is what you see on infantry and tanks, and a texture is what you see on buildings / map surfaces.

Quote:if I was to call it a skin or a texture you would know what I was talking about

If I call you an idiot, you'd know what I was talking about.

There is no technicality, a skin is an animation modifier.

Quote:According to Discreet's Gmax User Reference, skins are the 3D mesh itself and not the texture applied onto it. A quick search of the user reference for the word 'skin' returns 18 entries. 17 of the 18 are all referring to the 3D mesh of a model or modifiers that bend that 3D mesh. 1 of the 18 entries uses the word skin like this:

Quote:

Bitmaps are useful for creating many kinds of materials, from wood grains and wall surfaces to skin and feathers.

Quite literally referring to the look of biological skin and the way bitmaps can mimic the appearance. It would appear that in the documentation Discreet provided for the public, they do not consider a skin to be a texture. They define it as the mesh of the model itself.

Feel free to ignore me though, everyone else seems to when I bring this up.

If I was to call you an asshole you'd also know what I was talking about. You seem to forget not everybody cares about being correct and anal all the time like yourself. I myself would just prefer to call a texture a skin, end of story, and if you don't like that, well that's your problem..

Aircraftkiller

Look, read, laugh at how silly you are. It's just the Internet, after all. I personally just take most everything with a bit of salt and continue with what I was doing before.

Example... I forget most things on the Internet from 5 seconds to 15 minutes. I don't harbor hate for some person I'll never meet, and I don't bother getting worked up over 99% of what I encounter online.

If you do, I seriously suggest you look into ways to find something better to do with your time... For your own sake. I can't imagine how you would act in reality if you allow little things like words on a computer monitor to make you incredibly mad and cause you to throw out "I hate you" over and over.

The term "skin" or "to skin" when used to describe the bitmapped surface of a mesh is a metaphor.

Mr Aircraftkiller is just on a crusade to wind as many of you up as possible. Guess what? It's working.....

It may be a metaphor, but it's still incorrect.

A metaphor can't be incorrect, because it's a metaphor. If you treat a metaphor as a literal correlation, then it appears "incorrect". If I used a simile such as "I textured the mesh as if it was a skin" is that incorrect? No. It's allegorical and is obviously not intended to be interpreted literally, just like a metaphor.

I suppose so, but the problem is that the metaphor loses meaning when people only know that a texture is a skin and nothing more. Even worse is when they believe the geometry is a skin as well, so the entire thing becomes a skin to them regardless of surface properties and texture work.

I'd pay $10 to go back in time to slap some sense into the person that decided "skin" was analogous to a texture or model.

I'd pay £10 go back in time and convince the FBI that you were in fact a terrorist taking pictures of those silos, and let them dump you in Guantanamo Bay, and beat the crap out of you, but we can't have everything.

Anyway what does it matter, skin - texture, right - wrong, you're just making something out of nothing as you always do.

Reason for choosing alias:

Used to enjoy launching bottle rockets at low-flying Cessna aircraft back in Central Florida with friends. Hence the name.

Experience in position:

(Project Lead) For taking on leadership of the project, I was in the United States Marine Corps ROTC program for four years. Got out as a 1st Lieutenant, XO of Delta Company, 1st BN (Battalion).

(Level Design) I've been producing game levels, or terrain, since Microsoft's Flight Simulator 5.0 for Windows 95. After that, I went on to work on Red Alert, producing over 20 multiplayer levels. RA2 was next, producing 24 for that and Yuri's Revenge. I've made over 40 for Renegade, and over 20 for Renegade Alert.

Misc background information:

Favorite quote:

"Go away, boy, you bother me." - W.C. Fields

So he is born in 1985... I am from 1981 (that means I am 24 right now), I can call him a kid.

Go away, KID, you bother me.

Now that I know you are so young, I understand the lack of maturity you showed me when we tried to talk.
