Nah MSN is too popular,it has been out for years and years.....all MSN needs to do is add the features of GMAIL and they have a service better than any other.

when a company tries to build on someone elses idean in an attempt to become more popular, the popular company can simply steal the ideas of the new one and put them into theirs. for example E MAIL replies being kept in the same E MAIL is useful thing and I doubt MSN would have much trouble putting that into their system. Since MSN is part of microsoft, and it is microsoft's system both G-MAIL and HoTMaiL use, the creator is more likely to gain a fanbase than a third party.

Besides nobody really needs 1 gigabyte of free space and G-MAIL are probably bargaining on people not going near the limit. Think of how busy their servers would be in having to store and host multi-million amounts of KB, not to mention E MAIL attachments in which many would be MP3s that might have been sent to many recipents, if other G-MAIL users, and hence G-MAIL would have to host the bandwidth for those attachments too. It doesn't seem likely for a free service unless they have funding from another source.

For one thing, how random.

Secondly, you don't know for certain if you have A.D.D. or not, unless you go seek a doctor, ffs.

Yes, but they plan to make money to cover the cost of Gmail via email-relevant text ads. That's what they said at least.

LOL

whats so good about the Gmail drive?

u can use your mail account as an online storage..(for those that dont knwo) but whats the point? you cant direct link items in your account? can u?

why do people rave over this?

That would be a way to store it and make an online backup, but unless the attachments are public and not just in your account, it would be useless since no one else would be able to access them, unless of course you give them your password to your e-mail and let them login to it.

TheGunRun, Google won't do anything about you storing stuff on there, but they discourage the use of Gmail for online storage. Also you are limited to 10MB attatchments, and no .exe files are allowed.

Just remove the file extension and you can attach anything (folder options --> uncheck "Hide file extensions for known file types" --> remove it). When you need the file again, just add the file extension back onto it.

Umm...zip it? lmao
Anyway, I think GMail is way better than any other email service. Why? Well, you actually receive all spam (I think), it's just stored in a spam folder (deleted after 30 days of storage). Now, since you can't always tell if something is spam or not, you might get an important email deleted, because it's spam. With GMail, you can just check the spam folder, if you're not getting the email you've been waiting for. Also, the thing about not worrying about your storage size. I've used about 30Mb of my account. I won't ever have to delete an email. That's the whole idea!
With my old account I was constantly removing mail...it was way too small.

Not only could they be counting on people not using their whole disk space, but they can also count on saving disk space when one Gmail person emails a file to another Gmail person. Instead of having 2x that file, they could simply incremement the reference count and reference that file only once, but increase the disk usage for both users.

When you start emailing a movie to twenty people, it would really save some disk space doing it that way.
