Any program can have a corruption. Any program can get a exploit. This looks like a file not getting loaded properly by Windows.

Besides, what is this "latest Firefuck exploit that's been going around lately"? Do you even have proof that it does this?

j4S[p]Any program can have a corruption. Any program can get a exploit. This looks like a file not getting loaded properly by Windows.People say IE is extremely exploitable yet FireFuck has at least as many exploits. And the more people use it, the more exploits will be found since there is no point to search for exploits in programs that barely anyone uses. It's the same with windows and linux: the majority uses windows, thus it's the better target for the use of exploits while linux has probably as much possible exploits.

I've had Firefox for months, and I literally have had no problems what-so-ever with it or sites while using it, no glitches, crashes, or anything else. (Compared to IE crashing every couple minutes.)

Firefox is just much, much better then IE. It's also better then Opera because it does (or can do) everything that it does, and it's free.

(And no, a program isn't free if it has any advertisements, or a restriction of some kind in the program that has to be bought for it to be removed.)

With that logic, websites with advertisements are not free to view either. Opera is free for the end-user, the only time something isn't free for you would be when you have to pay for its services.

Normal sites don't quite apply here, sites that offer paid versions of the same site that remove advertisements/etc. would apply here, and aren't free.

Also, if a normal site has advertisements of any kind it still isn't really free. (Notice I never said "free to view" anywhere in my posts.)

Advertisements aren't a restriction. A lot of Opera users like the advertisements and refuse to upgrade. It all depends on whether or not you want them to appear... It does not restrict any tools in the program at all. Buying it unlocks nothing, the program is fully featured in the free version.

Opera is still free, the paid version is not.

meh, I don't care what I use (more or less), as long as it's not IE.

Problems avoided by not using IE:

Downloads don't randomly stall (much annoyance here when it stalls after downloading for a few hours, at 99% - seemingly for the reason that you moved the mouse).

PDF files don't cause the computer to temporarily stall when downloading and being opened, which IE seems to do at the same time.

Downloads can be resumed within the browser.

Nobody said Internet Explorer doesn't work right, my Internet Explorer works fine.. However, there are hundreds of exploits out there that target primarily Internet Explorer. We are worried about all the crap (spyware, trojans, viruses) out there targeting Internet Explorer. There are other websites that target Firefox, Opera, Netscape, etc. too.

If you want shitloads of spyware on your computer, please continue to use Internet Explorer.

Don't blame the browser itself when it's not the only one prone to such vulnerabilities. Do blame the browser when it's not just the only one that's vulnerable, but it is specifically targetted for the vulnerabilities.

If Firefox ever gets even close to as many vulnerabilities unique to itself as Internet Explorer does, then you can claim Firefox sucks. Until then, I'd hate to see what happens when that newest vulnerability hits your computer and your firewall and antivirus programs aren't yet patched for it. Firefox has so few instances of such that the likelihood of that occuring is negligable.

So, why not use Firefox, which is almost exactly, if not better, than Internet Explorer instead? Why waste your precious time cleaning out viruses, trojans, and spyware when your browser could of protected you from it. Plus, what happens if your Antivirus software doesn't detect these things. Then what?

Antivirus programs are meant for deleting stuff that you can't stop from entering your computer.

IE is alot more exploitable then Firefox because the ACTIVE-X shit.
And people just press "OK" ore yes on every site.

The Firefox exploit has to do with, installing a pluggin.

Thats basicly what im just talking about INSTALL Pluggins and stuff only FROM THE REAL Firefox site and not some other site.

Also not surfing to malicious site's and not updating your Windows and running a good firewall will save alot of trouble.

Remember the programs get updated. But the people who make the most money for it the people who make the adaware spyware. Don't sit still.

Oh,and i use FireFox and i dont have any problems with it.

EDIT: and why do you think that MS has announced that they will release there Explorer 7 before Longhorn and there is like a Windows Update every 2 weeks? simple because they feel the hot breath of Firefox in there neck

A "FIRE WALL" does not block harmful or suspicious packets from entering your computer and leaving your computer, you fucktard. A firewall helps prevent people from accessing your computer and stealing information.

Insane TechnologiesA firewall is a hardware device or software device which provide your computer with protection against would be hackers and viruses which attempt to directly connect to computers on the internet.

Don't use a WYSIWYG? If it doesn't work well at all cross-browser, it's not the browsers fault, it's obviously your fault. It is up to the HTML coder to make sure it works in all browsers PROPERLY, even if it might have a few cosmetic defects.

WYSIWYG > Notepad for the simple fact that, Time is Money. When you have no job and live in a basement you can spend all your awake time plodding away in Notepad lining things up and making your website. If you, maybe have a deadline, and perhaps have other things to do, a wife, kids, a boss who didn't just hire you to play around in singleplayer IRC all day.

Making a website in Notepad takes some HTML knowledge. WYSIWYG however isn't a walk in the park either. Sure anyone can do it, but it won't look good. It takes just as much skill to make a professional and streamlined website in a WYSIWYG editor as it is to do it in Notepad. Wether making a table means dragging that little tool at the top to say, 4x4, or typing

If the table doesn't look good it doesn't look good, in Notepad or WYSIWYG. You have to have the knowhow and the feel for design to make sure the website is astetically pleasing and serves its purpose.

Notepad isn't hard, if you can't type fast there is a problem...

Really, it's all a matter of knowing where the tables will end up, and how to use Photoshop

GeTSm0keDdreamweaver with cold fusion, flash and photoshop is my pick for pro site building - learning them all is another thing lolI'm not sure what cold fusion is, not being a web developer, but I can tell you that I dislike most sites that make even a small bit of use of Flash ... it requires the use of a plugin, and I don't particularly like installing plugins. I especially don't like company websites that are completely flash-based. It's quite unprofessional in my opinion.

I guess you could say I hate Flash in general.

I like to use dreamweaver so you can see what you do but i do type the code in there. Don't use the dumb gfx interface toa dd buttons etc lol

Also since i need to make websites that are good for handicapped ppl i found out that 95% off the websites really sux.

yeah most sites don't have the handicapped in mind.

I use Firefox & have never had any problems. IE is slower on my comp & I have everything updated. I love the extensions that you can install into Firefox. I especially like the adblock feature. I used it to block all of those nasty Gamespy & other advertisements on PlanetCNC & other sites. & the popup blocker works pretty good as well.

With the right combo of regularly updated apps you can keep your system totally safe. I haven't had a single spyware or virus on my computer since January.

I use Firefox also because of it's features. I'm addicted to tabbed browsing, Adblock, the SomethingAwful Last Read extension, minimalistic interface, and so on. Extra security is a plus, but not really necessary for me.

Quote:At c|net.com: IE vs. the world: six Web browsers compared
Posted by Pasta2000 on Fri, 05/20/2005 - 13:18 :: Personal | About FF | Seen Online | Spreading Firefox
At c|net.com, in the Reviews area, they have an article titled: IE vs. the world: six Web browsers compared. This article compares the following six web browsers and tells which is the best (Editors' Choice) and which are the worst.

Ranked Number 1 and Editors' Choice - Firefox
CNET rating of 8

Coming in tied at 2nd - Netscape 8 and Safari RSS
CNET rating of 7.7

3-way tie for last place - Internet Explorer (with Windows XP SP2), Deepnet Explorer, and Opera 8
CNET rating of 7.0

Click on the browser name for the full review for each web browser.

The bottom line and the most important thing to remember is that the people who work at c|net.com do reviews at a professional level and they picked Firefox as the best web browser.

CNET also has a very nice expanded view comparison chart of the six web browsers in the article.

I also posted this at my blog, Blogs for Firefox.
