One of your signature images really needs to go, preferably the ugly blue one. Your signature takes up more then half of the screen (on 1024x768).

Renardin, normally I'm pretty easy going but don't commit dumbassery. I don't use 800x600 because I can't afford a higher resolution. I use 800x600 because the text is easy to read, everything runs faster, and I am not tempted to put 900 icons on my desktop. 800x600 desktops are for work. 1600x1200 desktops are for Hoity Toity Frilly Cold Stone visiting iPod using yuppies. If Windows XP would allow it, I'd use 640x480.

An image, is an image, is an image.

All images are graphical, no matter what they're of, using the two terms together is redundant.

The rules dont mean graphical as in an image itself. You know how on movies when they go: "This movie has graphical content, parental discretion is advised", why don't you go back to my forums and actually read the rest of what the rules have to say.

Plus, you used the link www.text-image.com to counter what we said about the rules stating no "graphical images", as if images aren't graphics any longer if they just show text.

Graphical can also mean "explicit." Just because it is like "Graphics" doesn't mean they should be taken the same way.
