Let's see if any of you can prove if he exists or doesn't.

Don't say that he exists because a lot of people think it. Don't say "there isn't enough proof", supply your sources and be descriptive.

I'm personally a christian, and I believe in god. The proof: The bible, and many stories who others think are "coincidental", that a person would pray during a severe sickness, and then miraculously cured.

Whether or not a higher being exists can neither be proven nor disproven.

It's silly to think that you have an absolute answer to that question. Just because it's your truth doesn't mean it's everyone's truth.

As far as my beliefs, I feel that the odds we just existed are too small to convince me that we just happened by accident. I feel that a being set in motion the Big Bang. I'm not sure if it's the Christian god or not. I was brought up as a Christian, but after a couple years out of a Christian education, I started to have more of an open mind about the possibility that the Bible is just a story book. However, people that claim that it's ONLY a story book are just as ludicrous as those claiming that it's the ABSOLUTE "Word of God".

What makes me think there's something higher? I've had too many close calls while driving that I can't attribute to anything but coincidence or something higher. However, it's happened so often that I can't believe in it being coincidental. For instance, me not paying close enough attention of those driving around me that I accelerate and end up missing the car passing in front of me by a fraction of a second. This has happened several times.

Cogito ergo sum.

Many of the Enlightenment thinkers give an insight into this question, especially Descartes, who in his "Meditations" instead of starting at the top, started at the lowest point of thinking about the subject...am I really here at all? And gradually used reason to point to the theory of a benevolent god. Anyway I was raised Christian and still remain so even though I believe that I am very very far from what I would like to be.

It never will because it is a belief. God cannot be proven to exist and God cannot be proven to not exist. Because it is a belief; you believe there is a god.

You cannot use everyday reality to justify the presense of a protective force from above. And just how many people have "lost it" at that fraction of the second? So were they undeserving of God's mercy? It's about timing and Physics...and the reality of everyday life.

So, the innocent people on the hijacked 9/11 airliners were all bad? Were they deemed bad by God? It is a tragedy and death does not discriminate it's victims.

You must understand that good fortune and bad fortune befalls everyone regardless of religious beliefs. The believers' collective failure to understand this basic concept is why they still ask "why are evil people doing so well" and "why does God punish the righteous." Please think about it carefully.

Life is so simple, please don't make it much more complicated that it already is.

Believers don't collectively fail to understand this concept. Just because you may have good fortune or bad fortune in life does not mean you will or won't in the afterlife. Recommended reading is Luke 19-25(less than 5 minutes if you have the time.).

As for proving he exists. If you want hard tangible proof in this day and age that God exists. There is none. However, if you want hard tangible proof that he doesn't exist. There is none.

This is the only thing that I feel can be proven, there is overwhelming evidence to support the idea that we have evolved, tracing it all the way back to the first unicellular life, eukaryotic cells, multicellular organisms, mammals, primates, apes and eventually man - there is evidence in the fossil record, embryology, physiological similarities that clearly demonstrate evolution in action for ALL living things, ourselves included.

We simply were not put on this earth as human beings and in a few million years we will be as different from what we are today as we currently are from our ancestors such as australopithecus and the chimpanzees. Anybody who spends the time to really look at a chimpanzee or bonobo and refuses to admit the connection is simply kidding themselves.

Of course none of this will come close to disproving the existance of "God" as, as has been stated, it can't be done - for me though it disproves "that" argument which religious types often cling on to.

Uhh... do you even know what my beliefs are? I am a believer of the Big Bang. My whole point is that how life was sustained here in such a perfect balance that I can't view it to be anything other than some higher being's design.

Look at it this way: Rome had a creator. Nobody's going to argue that the founder just spoke the city/empire into existence. It evolved into the mighty empire that it was. I'm saying that there's a higher power that basically did the same thing. Except, the higher power is, obviously, more powerful than us and KNEW what was going to happen.

Starbuzz:

You COMPLETELY missed my point. I'm not talking about good or bad fortune and being "worthy" if a higher power's grace. I'm talking about how these incidents were as such that I feel are more than consequences. You can either look at everything one of two ways: everything's a miracle or nothing's a miracle. You, obviously, believe in the latter.

If life on earth is the result of a higher being's creation after the Big Bang, was that higher being also created by the Big Bang? If so, how was it created and why did it not need to be created--it surely is/was more complicated than the simple life that began on Earth? If not, does it really make any sense for something to have existed before (for lack of a better word) time and the physical universe?

^^ Love it.

I know that in some way you don't think our existance is an accident, I disagree with that completely and think it's complete 100% pure luck.

God surely didn't create a damn thing if all he did was blow up a big bomb and let everything do it's thing, in rome everything was designed each structure was created by humans following that design. I find arguments such as "it's too hard to comprehend" or "the odds are too slim" so therefor God must have done it to be laughable tbh - for me God is a way of people explaining things they don't understand, things that we never used to understand such as evolution God used to be responsible for I think the discovery of these sorts of things and the shift in beliefs of a lot of religious types shows, to me at least, evidence to reinforce my view.

To answer your post, I repost my response in the "are we alone?" thread:

my brilliant self you can't mock someone for believing in the opposite and not consider yourself to be a hypocrite because it comes down to the same principle belief. Something always existed. Whether it was the matter, the matter's creator, the matter's creator's creator, and so on... That's what's up for debate. It's, also, quite silly for people to be calling each other idiots because one believes in a creator for the matter, or just the matter.

For any of us to even attempt to claim that a god can't exist is laughable. If no god exists, where did the matter come from? If it always existed, how is that any less ludicrous than a god always existing?

All the more reason to believe or concede that the possibility that our universe is a creation of some being. If everything was created in that instant then isn't it more logical that our existence, our universe is entertainment for some higher power?

So stop thinking about the higher being having our notion of consciousness, then. Just because we can't imagine that it exists doesn't mean that it can't exist.

Being a materialist I have trouble seeing how any kind of consciousness could exist without some kind of time-dependent brain processes going on. Anyway, talking about what happened before the Big Bang is silly because anything you (or I) say is totally unfounded.

I'm religious, but I have a skewed way of looking at life.

It's said God made us in his image, right? Well humanity is friggin' lazy as hell.

So God created the Earth, but then he got bored, so he has us on some 'set-it-and-forget' scheme where we evolve, think for ourselves, etc. Humans love that kind of stuff, where we don't have to micromanage everything. So why should God?

I love my theory, because it ties in creationism, and evolution, which both have quite a few similarities.

Yeah, I agree with Ryu. We may all have different opinions and we have no idea what will happen after we die (and we have opinons on that too!).

Eitherway, what we do know is that our bodies will decay and perish after we die and I am not sure if we will get it back. And the world has many good things (like Renegade and Burger King and F1 racing) and we should not fail to enjoy the life while we can.

I would expect that an adult, especially of your age, would see things a little differently than that. Just because there's no "right or wrong" answer doesn't mean that it's pointless to debate.

Politics is a bunch of opinions that are neither right or wrong, but it's still debated... and for a reason.

Discussing these types of subjects only become pointless when it's just a bunch of thick-headed idiots claiming to hold the absolute truth on the matter.

Debates on theology need not be a trip down idiocy lane.

Ad Hominem should never be brought to the forefront of any discussion where intellect and reason is supposedly being used.

But I think that this is where these debates break down in places like this.

One cannot expect children who haven't experienced anything beyond themselves in the responsibility and critical thinking arenas to be able to logically reason in a non-confrontational way.

The measure of a man is in the way he interacts with and respects others. Not in his "correctness" or ability to "win" a discussion.

No silly.

It's because you and your elite grammar skills represent the higher end of the intelligence quotient here.
care more about grammar geek.
