from the website:

"The lock entry tools we offer are not for sale to the general public and are available for sale to professionals only! All other products are available to the general public."

and yes the site looks legit... the company exists.

Second.

You need a locksmith's license to legally own one though.

The law in different parts of the world regarding lock pick tools is different.

In some countries (and some US states) you dont need licenses to have lock pick tools and in others you do.

You need to check up what the law that applies to YOU is before you buy any lock picking equipment.

Dude, have you watched all of the videos?

You're compensating in a way because your brain knows having sex with animals is a nono.

Of course, you can keep denying it, but that's the way it is.

Just like you probably love the Aperture Science Weighted Companion Cube.

SO ANYWAY!

Fuck it. I give up, take my crappy topic.

I've dabbled in locksmithing, and I'd suggest after finding a good tutorial, head on down to True Value, or Home Depot, and find a decent lock.

Do NOT buy a Schlage brand lock, because they are a bitch to crack (which is why I use them). Instead, find a cheaper, generic brand or a Kwikset.
