Project Superman.

The following link is the recollection of memories of events from a man who lived a life of psychological confusion, control, and extraordinary abilities.

Reading this article tests what you believe the limits are when it comes to tackling obstacles using mind over matter. How much can the mind handle? If you set your mind to it, can you really do anything?

Generally speaking, I can only work through half of your forum posts before my brain explodes.

Sounds like pseudoscience...I hate pseudoscience!

edit: Also that website is a heavily visited conspiracy theory site! I think I visited this site before.

Pawksy said it, this is pseudoscience, which is a nice way of saying not-science.

Did you start reading the article? I don't think you did because you assumed I was talking about a scientific study.

This article is a memoir about a man who was victim of a government genetic augmentation program.

It's neither a conspiracy or a theory. Even if the story turns out to be fictional, it's still an interesting read.

However, the project (Project Superman) does exist and has been around since the 60s.

Interesting? No. The other thing. What's the word? Tedious.

that's alot to read but speaking of how much can the mind handle, then we could only imagine, since the brain is used only 10% now

Do you call reading a book/novel tedious?

Only if you have no interest in the subject. And since you obviously have no interest, I'd appreciate it if you stop commenting.

This article is more like a short novel rather than a "article." I'm not even done reading it.

It's like a sadistic/thriller/horror novel of some sort. I find it interesting. I spent a few hours reading it yesterday and the time flew by astonishingly fast.

I read the entire thing. Started out pretty interesting and somewhat believable. But up to the 6th or 7th page, it went a little crazy.
