I think WoW killed a lot of my real-life friends, who used to have a lot of free time, jobs, and girlfriends, but are now hoard up in their basements playing WoW 10 hours a day eating

Wendey's Baconators whenever they get hungry.

Yeah, I never understood the attraction to the game. I've watched people play it - it looks terrible.

I didn't really have anything positive to say about the game either, until I actually tried it. It really is, if anything else, a complicated but fun RPG.

And both my parents and my two brothers ensure I don't (can't) spend too much time on it anyhow :S

I'm not falling into an addiction pit of despair, unlike the typical player.

It's fun, but I know that nothing horrid will happen to my character if I don't use him for a day or two.

And Renegade still wins for tactics, availability, and just plain fun, so I'm no turncoat. =<

My first WoW experience:

- Camera > How the hell can people play with this spastic camera?
- Movement > Horrible!
- Graphics > Am I playing the right game? This kinda looks like Warcraft 3, but then without the level boundaries.

After 5 minutes of playing I removed the game from my HDD to prevent me from getting a huge trauma. Unfortunately, Blizzard keeps telling the world to try their fed up game at trywarcraft dot com.

I hope Blizzard dies a long and slow death until they are bankrupt. May the financial crisis hit them hard.

They're one of the few fast food places I can stand (outside of the occasional chicken sandwich from Burger King or fries from McDonalds) anymore. Their burgers actually taste like, holy shit, burgers! And not charcoal or paper or cardboard! Also, they have better bread. Don't ask me how it's better, but it's shittons better than McDonalds' crap.

I think that ordering pizza is the most a WoW nerd would do for anything more than cheetos and dew. Not even Wendy's.

Derp.

That would make sense, since MMOs generally have lower graphical requirements due to how fucking huge everything is, and since WoW was released at around the same time WarCraft 3: The Frozen Throne was (They were, in fact, being developed concurrently), and the art style would be consistent since the two games are part of the same series being developed by the same developer.

I'm sure they'll feel the effects of your curse as soon as they're done rolling around in WoW cash, and the small fortune they're going to earn on StarCraft II once the WoW cash runs out, and the small fortune they're going to earn on Diablo III once the StarCraft II cash runs out.

If so many people believe in it, it must do at least some good. And it does! People have kicked their addictions and whatnot in the name of Jesus. While it doesn't mean that all sorts of religious dogma is proven correct just because of the numbers of members who believe, it does mean that a statement like "I hope the catholic church dies a long and slow death untill they are bankrupt. May the financial crisis hit them hard." are just melodramatic overreaction.

If Dover's logic is faulty, then just because many people addict themselves on WoW, it doesn't mean I will.

I haven't played since Friday, I was away for the weekend. And while I'd like to be playing it, I'm not suffering WoW withdrawal.

I agree with addiction: it's a good game in my opinion, but if you cannot go several days without it then it's a problem.

And yes, a lot of the gameplay is like a job, wha with questing and farming, but for me it contributes somewhat to the realism, and if it gets tedious I just find a few players to party with. I enjoy partying because we work together and combine our skills to take on more enemies than usual.

Just because you're not addicted(or have a dependance, whether psychological or otherwise) to something doesn't mean it won't negatively affect your life. So be careful, your energy/time that could go towards being productive may end up being spent "being productive" in WoW.

The same can be said for any game, including Renegade (And even ones that have a much larger acceptance in the greater society like Chess). Any time not spent "being productive" (There's a subjective term if there ever was one) would be a negative affect on life by the strictest standards.

I think we can agree "being productive" in WoW doesn't translate well into being productive in the "real world", but where do you draw the line? How much time is acceptable for people to spend on their own enjoyment? Labor activists used to have a slogan that went "Eight hours for work, eight hours for sleep, and eight hours for whatever we please". How much time is it necessary to spend on one's own enjoyment to keep morale up?

I'm happy this shit-tastic thread is finally turning around.

There are only two ways to NOT like an MMORPG:

1. Develop opinion based on looking at it and not playing it.
2. It conflicts with beliefs or knowledge you already posses. (For example, if a Star Wars MMO came out, but it didn't feel like Star Wars, you wouldn't like it.)

Basically, if you play an MMORPG, you WILL like it and WILL want to play it more.

They are like drugs. Bad to use and bad to play... but addicting nonetheless.

No. The third option is that some of us have tried the games from that genre and realized they suck. Yeas ago, they had a Sims Online game, and I got a free trial for a week.

I tried it out, and thought it was cool for all of ten minutes before I realized that you had to spend time gaining dumb skills to advance a career and stuff... aka 'grinding' which seems to be a necessity in all these games. It's boring as hell. You have to work at making your ingame character better, and I didn't find that aspect fun at all. I got bored after about two hours.

Although perhaps me wasting all the money I had at the start on the multiple whorehouses ingame likely contributed as well.

Ditto. I've also played games like City of Heroes, which to me is a lot better than WoW, but the fact that I have to put hours into making my character decent is boring to me. Then again, I've never liked or finished any RPG in my life, and I have given that genre many chances.

I'd rather jump in an FPS or RTS once or twice a week, have a full hour or two of fun, than put up with building a character, going on raids, dying and having to walk to my body. I think more happens in one game of Renegade than one full day of WoW.

That falls under #2.

It's defying what you believe should be the way it should work.

I can think up half a dozen ways not to like an MMORPG that don't fall under those two.

That's not really my point. I guess my point is that a game like WoW where you're constantly working towards and achieving new goals can be much easier to keep someone's attention than a game where you keep striving for the same goals(IE: Ren, FPS games), I should have said that instead of said "being productive".

I wasn't really saying that other games can't take away your productivity.

Ren's core gameplay hardly ever changes. What keeps it interesting is the constantly revolving teammates, tactics, and present skills.

And modifications, I guess.
