Only happens with Internet Explorer and Opera.

Edit: EvilWhiteDragon found the real problem.

By the way, using the <center> tag over all that in-line code is bad practice. Better to use proper CSS styling.

Crimson/some admin should look for </span</center> in the source. Due to the not being properly closed it doesn't see the </center> close of the centered content.

EPIC FAIL.

Speaking of annoying... I don't know about anyone else but I keep getting a popup that says "Enter username and password for ftp://ftp.blackintel.org" in each thread that you have posted in. That had to do with our website move, my excuse for that. It should be fixed now/when your DNS refreshes. I made the mistake of directing ftp.blackintel.org to the wrong server and therefore it required a password. Now it is fixed and pointing to the BlackIntel box with an anonymous FTP account.

May I recommend force updating your DNS cache? You can do so by pressing start, type in cmd /k ipconfig /flushdns and right click run it and select run in admin mode.

On windows XP do start -> run -> type in: cmd /k ipconfig /flushdns -> enter

Sorry about that. I didn't notice it because I use Firefox.

I'm using the inline shit because all the individual parts of the site are in little blocks that are edited in a template editor with all sorts of variables and whatnot. Making tiny changes inline is easier than creating a whole different CSS class for it.

Heh?

We didn't change anything. Yes our redirect broke, but that shouldn't have triggered FTP.

Particularly because all request of to the (broken) apache server first and are then redirected to the FTP server.

Is this still happening now or?
