I dont exactly buy into this story but for the record the film was damaged and probably had to under go some restoration process. I mean, did u see the pic of the camera he claims took the pic ? Having developed my own film before I can assure you any restoration (esp done by amature) will yield funny looking pictures.

Oh, on second look, it said that in reference to that link...

Quote:Link: <http://www.mountainsub.com>

Do not believe a WORD they say on this site!

Quote:This shot was obviously taken just moments before something struck the plane. You can see the wing and tail of the plane as the photographer pointed the camera out the window back in the direction from where they had come. As the story at mountainsub.com states, the plane had obviously strayed into restricted airspace by accident due to engine problems. In the distance you can see what is clearly a chopper of some kind. But the plane was never escorted to an airfield as is stated on their site - it was simply blown out of the sky. There is an exhaust trail behind whatever it is that struck the plane. I imagine it must have been some type of missile. The chopper escort probably guided the plane a long way from the secret installation before destroying it.

That site said not to believe what <http://www.mountainsub.com> had to say, not what that site had to say...

Hardly evidence, I also am a amateur website designer. These of course are all basic html tags and the fact that they both flow the same way doesnt mean they are made by the same person. There is nothing that is normally customized here. On the other foot if there were meta tags for search engines etc that matched that would be different. Nice effort on the detective work but I dont think it constitutes much of anything.

Except for the meta tag, the rest are default html tags, 98% of the websites you'll find use those, some take advantage of what the meta tags can do, and some are made by Front Page and will have the extra couple of meta tags like that one.

There is no evidence there whatso ever to prove nothing, except that the page was made using HTML. :rolleyes:

Wow, brilliant discovery!

I've finally figured this out...

backwards it spells: 7 11 Kra

But Kra is a intregal part of this...

I believe Aliens are very stupid, and cannot spell worth a crap, so the "Kra" was supposed to say "Crap" but they misspelled it and the last letter, p, was torn off when it crashed, therefore "7 11 Kra", in other words, we are the trash can of space convenient stores...

It rang one day and it was someone on the other line speaking some weird language. I thought it was the Mexicans next door speaking spanish again. I guess it wasn't.
